What does B&W photography provide for you as a Photographer?

Black and white photography give photographers a new lens to look through; it helps photographers differentiate between contrast and light on the subject, it also aids to display more emotion through the lack of color.

Example

The colored image's background does not provide much attention to the haybales in the water, which the black and white image does.

Example

The black and white image provides more attention to the cracks in the sign presenting a more depressive theme, meanwhile he colored image doesn't really provide anything special to the image.

What does the display of emotion provide?

These emotions are easily able to be exaggerated by black and white photography to be more appeasing to the viewer. Because of this images that don't look as good or appeasing in color might be a great B&W picture.

Example

The colorful background of the trees, fence, and trashcan draw attention away from the subject (The mailboxes) in black and white with a bit of cropping and contrast editing the viewer's attention immediately goes to the rusty old mailboxes.

Example

In the portrait shots above the subject's jacket although not distracting a conversion to black and white convert the image to a more equal tone. This way even the more distracting elements of the background blend in

Summary

Black and White photography has many tools that are useful to a photographer. The ability to recognize and differentiate lighting and contrast are appli cable even while not shooting in B&W. These processes assist in saving images that don’t look good in color, they are able to remove distracting backgrounds and convey emotions that their colored counterparts cannot.
